F the Candour of the Author of the Inquiry be equal to his Parts, which there appears no Reason to question, I have cause to expect, he will not be offended at the Freedom of the following Animadversions. He designed, no doubt, his Book, as an Expression of his Benevolence to Mankind, in the promoting of Truth, upon a Subject of the greatest Importance to them: And as I humbly presume to pursue the same Design, and shall give him no occasion to suspect my Sincerity; tho I should be so unfortunate as to miscarry in the pursuit, I have reason to hope, that the goodness of my Intention, will easily prevail with him, to excuse the following Examination of his Doctrine. HE has a great many pretty Thoughts in his first Treatise upon Beauty, and all just and rational enough, for ought I know; for I have only given it a cursory reading over. But the Subject of the second Treatise, being what has frequently exercised my Thoughts, in the Course of my Life, and especially of late, upon an Occasion pretty well known to the World, I have read that part of his Book with a closer Attention, and heartily thank the ingenious Author, for the Entertainment it has given me, and the further Confirmation of those Sentiments I have long had, with regard to Moral Good and Evil; not that I have the happiness entirely to agree...
