Not illustrated. 1922 Excerpt: . . . pink, with gold upon it; a cap for a rais1--a cap such as he had never seen. When his father placed it on his head, no words would come, but his eyes grew larger than ever, and his poor little body trembled. The cap was his magic cap, ushering him into a new world, in which imagination had a chance. It was more often in his hot little hands than on his head--a wonder to be twirled and admired. At last they reached Mysore. Here, full as the high road had been, men were packed like grain in a granary, and all the quaint bazaar streets were crowded with an excited, chattering throng, hourly swelled by fresh masses from road and railway. There was so much to admire that Tota even forgot his cap; besides, he had been given a pink shirt as well, clad in which he actually strutted by his fathers side and asked questions, instead of dragging behind. . . and his father was as excited as he was, so infectious was the holiday spirit. They wandered through green gardens, full of flowering trees and bright beds of cannas--orange 1 Rais A large landowner. and crimson and yellow; they saw purple bougainvillea against white buildings; and walked on broad red roads, whereon cars sped by without horses and left Tota gasping. In the midst of the city was the Maharajahs palace, its great golden dome catching the brightness of the sun; they stood...
