Original publisher: Golden, Colo. : Solar Energy Research Institute, 1987 OCLC Number: (OCoLC)679998953 Subject: Wind turbines -- Aerodynamics. Excerpt: . . . integrated performance with minimal impact on computational resources. However, inherent assumptions in the theory limit its usefulness in producing detailed blade aerodynamic distributions for diagnostic or design information. Originally derived for analysis of cruising propellers with very slight induced velocity, these procedures are more frequently applied to rotors in hover, and low speed climb or descent. In most applications adjustments to the theory are necessary, especially to provide correct levels of induced power. These corrections may be categorized as either modifying the radial distribution of induced velocity or the overall magnitude of the induced velocity. of Radial Loading Accuracy The category of corrections dealing with the modification of the radial induced velocity is the most familiar and includes the array of methods to approximate the physical boundary condition of zero loading at the streamwise edges, or tips of lifting blades. Most procedures are derived with various degrees of simplification from the original work of Prandtl and Betz as best described by Glauert (Reference 4). In concept the correction accounts for tip losses associated with a finite number of blades. That is, momentum theory always assumes an infinite number of lightly loaded blades of infinite aspect ratio, and thus non-zero loading at blade tips. This assumption also equates to azimuthwise uniform induced velocity. Actually, there is an impulse of induced velocity from each blades trailed wake causing the velocity at the blades to be higher than the disk average. It is also a particular blades wake that causes that blades loading to smoothly approach zero at the tip....
